Read the article carefully. There are two (2) tasks to do on the next page after you read.

The environmental campaigns in England

The environment is a hot issue in the UK. Since the 1980s, awareness of the consequences of industrial pollution, nuclear waste, carbon dioxide emissions and global warming has grown significantly. More recently, the BSE beef crisis and the GM food controversy have made the British public even more sensitive to the application of science and agricultural error.

1. Campaign groups like Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace have been putting pressure on governments and businesses for many years to introduce stricter standards for environmental protection.

2. As the name suggests, this type of protestor uses direct action in order to target opponents. Such groups lead non-violent but illegal actions, although some eco-warriors have adopted violent tactics as part of the struggle against globalisation.

3. While Friends of the Earth became a general lobbying organisation concerned with issues such as transport, energy, food, Greenpeace followed a strategy of direct action, organising special projects aimed to create maximum publicity.

4. One of its ships, the Rainbow Warrior, was famously blown up by the French secret service in the 1980s because of its involvement in protests against French nuclear tests in the Pacific Ocean.

In the 1990s, environmental campaigns in the UK started to borrow Greenpeace-style methods to disrupt road-building projects, which were threatening certain country areas, particularly of outstanding natural beauty or historical importance. 5.....

The most famous of these eco-warriors was called 'Swampy'. In January 1997, he blocked himself in a tunnel for a week under the site of a road extension project near Exeter in Southern England. These anti-road actions won a lot of publicity and support for environmental causes. Nevertheless, the roads usually went ahead and this lack of real success convinced many eco-warriors to direct their efforts against a bigger enemy, namely global capitalisation.
