ENDANGERED LANGUAGES

An astonishing 7,000 different languages are spoken on Earth today. However, nearly 80% of the population speaks only 1% of these languages and more than 40% of the planet's languages are "endangered", meaning that there are very few living native speakers. Many of these languages also lack a system of writing. When the speakers die, the language dies with them. Without action, the vast majority of these 3,000 endangered languages, many of which have not been recorded or studied at all, could soon disappear.

Endangered languages can be found throughout the world. Some, like the Koro language in north-eastern India, have only recently become known to the outside world. About 1,000 people on Earth speak Koro, but as endangered languages go, this is a relatively robust figure. Many languages now have fewer than ten speakers. The crisis is not limited to remote regions of the world. When Europeans first arrived in North America, 312 different languages were in use, of which 123 are now known to be extinct. Of the surviving languages, most speakers are grandparents and great-grandparents.

Different researchers offer different definitions of "endangered". The system of classification used by the Catalogue of Endangered Languages (ELCat) evaluates languages in four areas: how often the language is transmitted to the next generation, the total number of speakers, the rate at which it is losing speakers, and the situations in which it is used. Based on this data, languages are ranked on a six-point scale from "safe" to "severely endangered". The midpoint, "endangered", refers to a language with between 100 and 1,000 speakers who represent about half of the language's community or ethnic group. The language is spoken only by some parents, of whom very few teach it to their children. It is primarily used at home and is not taught in schools or used for government business.

Languages become endangered due to a number of interrelated factors, including globalization, economics, technology, education policy, and changes in cultural attitudes. As the forces of globalization make the world more interconnected, previously isolated language communities come under pressure to participate in the larger economy, which means learning the area's majority language. In response, local schools often begin to teach the majority language instead of the local tongue. Local languages also suffer as communities adopt cell phones and computers, most of which run on software that has been translated into only a handful of languages. This trend accelerates as these devices connect users to the Internet. At this point, many communities undergo a cultural shift in which parents no longer value the language enough to teach it to their children.

The endangerment or extinction of a language is of course a great loss for the community in which it is spoken, but it is also a loss for the world at large. A language is more than a list of words for things. It expresses concepts, values, stories and viewpoints that are unique to its community and, in many cases, uniquely valuable to the world. Because the great majority of these languages are not written languages, a culture's oral literature is at risk when its language is endangered, as is a great deal of historical knowledge. Knowledge of the natural world and the local environment is also lost, and this can have real consequences for all of us. To cite one example, in recent years numerous valuable medicines have been found in plants tended, cultivated, and best understood by speakers of endangered languages. One researcher, working with a local healer in Samoa, discovered plant-based cures that led to a drug, Prostratin, which is used to treat yellow fever and may even be effective against HIV.
