Beijing smog

The Chinese capital Beijing has for many years suffered from serious air pollution. Primary sources of pollutants include exhaust emissions from Beijing's more than five million motor vehicles, coal burning in neighbouring regions, dust storms from the north and local construction dust.

Smog in the Chinese capital of Beijing has got so bad that the government has banned half of all vehicles from taking to the roads. Severe restrictions are in force in Beijing to limit air pollution after the city declared a red alert for the first time.

A report from the BBC's John Sudworth says that Beijing's air has turned into a familiar smoggy soup with pollution well over ten times safe levels. But last week was actually much worse. At that point, some of the most dangerous pollutants reached almost 40 times the World Health Organisation's recommended maximum. And the lack of a red alert warning from the authorities was met with howls of derision. Now, the government has finally taken the costly steps of limiting car use and keeping children at home.
