LISTENING COMPREHENSION

(please read twice)

Michael

I have job as a lifeguard on the beach in Cornwall, and last year I was really embarrassed to see that someone had written "Second-home owners go home! Free Cornwall now!" on the big wall next to the beach. To be honest, if the second-home owners sold up and went somewhere else, it would be an economic disaster for the area. Let's face it: Cornwall is a poor part of England. There is very little industry here. Most people make their money in a few short months of the year from the tourist trade. You've got to spend a winter in Cornwall to realise what it's like when the tourists go home. It's dead! Celebrity chefs such as Jamie Oliver and Rick Stein have suddenly made the area a tourist magnet and have given us all a reason to be proud of our county. People rent cottages, buy souvenirs, hire boats and wetsuits. I am really proud of Cornwall. It's special and it's a real privilege to live here... I don't care if I never get rich... After all, it's the quality of life that counts.

Becky

My family has always lived in the same town in Cornwall and now I can never even hope to live here, or even near here – as the house prices have gone crazy. No wonder young people are angry. After all, rich people come here for a few weeks each summer and think they own the place. We call the rich kids 'snob yobs' because they party all night on the beaches, make a mess and give all young people a bad name. The number of old people is growing massively each year and the resources of the area are badly stretched, but most of the money goes on things for the tourists, not for people who live here. Our water system suddenly has to cope with thousands of visitors. Our roads are mostly little country lanes and they get like Piccadilly Circus in the summer. Not only that, greed has forced many of the local people to charge stupidly high prices for things like car-park fees near beaches, ice creams, cold drinks. It is all very well to say that people like Jamie Oliver have brought good food to Cornwall... But who can afford to eat in his restaurant? I can't!

TEACHER

You and your friend have been invited to Tim's birthday party on Saturday. You know Tim quite well. He likes geography, visiting foreign countries, taking photographs, and reading books. He is not interested in sport or music. You haven't bought a present for him yet either.
